Good News in China

HAROLD W. ROBINSON '10

And son "Jimmy" learn (last summer) of his acceptance for admission to the College.

Dangerous Post

TO THE EDITOR:

Since I wrote in June the guerilla forces have extended their control over more area here in the north and the Chinese Central Government has improved its civil government in this area. In this province of Shantung, and Hopei to the west, the Central Government has a civil governor in each province. Under these governors are county magistrates in nearly all of the counties so that the whole administration is in the hands of the Chinese. About the middle of August the guerrillas destroyed sections of the railways in these provinces and for about ten days there was no passenger service between here and Tsinan.

Stronger Central Government

The spirit of loyalty to the Central Government, and the belief that the invaders will not be able to conquer China, increases constantly in this part of the country. Even if Hankow falls, as it is likely to do in the near future, China will not be a conquered country. I don't know how long the struggle will continue but I do not look for an early cessation, much as I wish it were possible. Tremendous forces have been set loose and it is a much more difficult task to stop them than it was to start them.

I am enclosing a snapshot of myself and my seventeen-year-old son, "Jimmy," who is now in Dartmouth. This picture was taken just after we received the good news that he had been admitted to Dartmouth. The smiles on our faces indicate how the news affected us.
